William Miller Objects to Joe Smith's Methods

AND REGISTERS A KICK

Picked Up as a Suspended Perpetrator of a Mysterious Crime in Pleasant, He Don't Think.

William Miller, a colored man, was picked up late yesterday afternoon in the court room at the McKeen trial by Detective Durr and Smith on suspicion of being the man who strangled a girl 14 years old one week ago last Saturday night in the eastern part of the city. After questioning him thoroughly and finding that he could give a good account of himself Miller was discharged. Last night Mr. Miller was seen in the court room and expressed his mind very freely about detectives who had nothing to do but pick up every colored man in town because a crime had been committed by a colored man. "Joe Smith knew me well enough," said he, "for I have worked for J. G. Craig on Canal street and have been in this city for eight years. It's got so that a colored man dare not walk out on the streets without fear of being pounced on by Joe Smith and made to give an account by himself. I wonder if that is what the city pays him his salary for. They didn't even tell me what they thought I had been doing and it was not until after I came back to the court room that I learned anything about it."
